CAMBRIDGE:
PUBLISHED BY J. D. BALDWIN,

1859.

PREFACE.

We present to the citizens of Cambridge, the tenth volume of the Cambridge Directory. It will be seen that the number of names is about the same as two years ago, although a large proportion of those who were then here as operatives at the various business establishments, have left the city in consequence of the partial suspension of business during the past twelve or eighteen months. This shows a large increase of permanent inhabitants of the city. A revival of business will bring back those who have left, or bring others to fill their places.

We have spared neither pains nor expense to make this volume of the Directory correct. It will be noticed, that much inconvenience would be avoided if our houses were all numbered, and if there were not several cases of two or three streets with the same name. It is desirable that the City Government should remove these causes of inconvenience and confusion; and we hope it will consider the importance of doing so.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1853, by

J. D. BALDWIN,

In the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the District of Massachusetts

THE CAMBRIDGE OBSERVATORY.

The Observatory of Harvard College is situated in North latitude, 42°. 22′ 43″.7. and West longitude 4° 44″ 30′.7. The hill upon which it is built rises rather abruptly from the South to the height of eighty feet above the level of the sea. Eastward, the ground has a gradual descent towards the plain on which the academical buildings of the University are situated. The position is favorable for the purposes of an Astronomical Observatory, and commands an extensive view of the surrounding country. The grounds comprise about six and a quarter acres. The length of the principal Observatory Building is one hundred and seventy feet, this includes the dwelling-house of the Diretor, on the eastern side.

The computer's room, which is the first in order, is entered from the dwelling house. It is eighteen feet square, and contains, an Electric recording apparatus, a Siderial Clock, a standard Barometer, Thermometers, Books, Charts, &c. The Clock and Barometer are attached to a stone pier which rests on a solid foundation of granite and is, like every other pier in the Observatory, completely insulated from the floor and other parts of the building. Adjoining the central Tower, and between it and the computer's room is the apartment containing the Transit Circle, Normal Pendulum, and electric telegraph apparatus connecting the Observatory with Boston, and distant stations through the wires extending to Craigie's bridge. Charles River is crossed by means of a submerged cable. A constant communication is thus kept up with Boston, and the Observatory time made available for the regulation of time in the Metropolis. The time from the Observatory is communicated free of charge.

The Transit circle was made by Messrs. Troughton & Simms of London. Its telescope has a focal length of five feet, the graduated circles are four feet in diameter, and are read off by eight reading microscopes affixed to the granite piers supporting the instrument. Two meridian marks, for adjusting the instrument in collimation and azimuth, are placed, the southern one in West Roxbury, and the northern in Medford.

The central building is appropriated to the great Telescope. It is thirty two feet square, the walls are of brick on a granite foundation, they are carried up square to the coving on the outside, the interior is brought into a circular form, by having the corners arched and recessed in such a manner as to form a firm support to the Dome which is spherical and thirty-two feet in diameter; the arched recesses in the Dome room on the second story are appropriated in the following manner: the recess on the Northeast, holds the apparatus used occasionally with the large telescope, and affords space also for a Balanced Chair by which more ready access is had to the Dome from below—in the Northwest corner stands the Comet-seeker when not in use, together with a celestial globe, a writing table and other accommodations for an assistant. In the Southeast recess is the machinery for turning the dome; and the main entrance occupies the Southwest corner. The circular wall is completed by a layer of stone one foot in thickness, by eleven inches in depth, upon this is secured a series of cast-iron plates grooved in a circular form to correspond to the circumference of the dome, forming altogether a complete circle; a similar iron track is laid and bolted on the lower section of the dome, and between these grooved tracks are placed eight truly turned iron balls, the balls are eight inches in diameter and upon them the dome rolls with great ease and steadiness. There is an opening in the dome, five feet wide, extending from the horizon to a few degrees beyond the zenith, this opening is provided with shutters moving on iron railways. There is a large chair of peculiar construction, in this apartment, it is designed to accommodate the observer in the long sweeps which the telescope makes when directed to different quarters of the heavens. On the outside of the tower are iron balconies, these are occupied whenever an extensive examination of the heavens is made with the Comet-seeker.

The foundation of the great pier for the support of the Telescope, is twenty six feet below the natural surface of the ground. It is twenty-two feet in diameter at the base, and ten feet, at the top; its form is the frustum of a cone, the pier rises to the height of fifty-five feet, including the granite pedestal to which the bed-plate of the Equatorial is secured. The Telescope itself is twenty-three feet in length and is provided with eighteen eye-pieces, ranging in power from 103 to 2004. This Telescope is not excelled by any in the world.

The West-transit room is 18 by 36 feet; it contains a four foot transit instrument mounted on granite piers, a variation transit for magnetic observation, the Lloyd magnetometers, and several portable telescopes, an electric-recording machine, books, and cases for manuscript observations.

A framed octagonal shaft rises thirty-six feet in height from the centre of the West-wing, upon this is mounted a five foot refracting Equatorial, covered by a dome twelve feet in diameter revolving on iron balls in a manner similar to the great dome, but is readily turned by hand without the aid of machinery.

North of the central tower is the prime vertical room with stone piers for the support of a prime vertical transit instrument, the West transit is occasionally placed on these piers. Sliding shutters on the roof and sides are provided for this as well as for the meridian instruments.

The South room is appropriated to the Library; this contains about twelve hundred volumes almost exclusively relating to astronomical subjects. In the Library is a portrait of Mr. Edward Bromfield Phillips, to whose thoughtful liberality the Observatory is indebted for its principal endowment. W. C. B.

"NEW ORIENT,"

FOR THE

Parlor, Office, Store or Hall.

Great as has been the "Improvements" of late in stoves for warming, a comparison of this with any other stove, as well as the testimony of all who are using it, satisfactorily attest its INCOMPARABLE SUPERIORITY. 1st. It is unusually neat in appearance. 2d. It requires but 12 pounds of coal in 24 hours. 3d. It produces any amount of heat required. 4th. It thoroughly ventilates while it warms the apartment, producing a current of air moist, pure and agreeable. The register in the cylinder graduates the heat to any temperature, and if required the fire may be preserved the ENTIRE SEASON.

The coal consumes entirely, making no clinkers, and by a new and perfect coal grate the fire is easily quickened, and when required all the ashes are removed, making no dust; in this respect also this stove has no equal.

The "ventilating pipe" is enclosed in the stove cylinder, thus requiring less room than any other Radiating Stove.

FOR POOR CHIMNEYS it is particularly adapted, having also the DIRECT DRAUGHT.

ANOTHER FEATURE in the Parlor Orient is an original and curious arrangement, by which, with a slight movement, a place appears as if by magic, in which either BAKING or BOILING can be done at pleasure. Nothing of the kind attempted before in other stoves can compare with this. It works to admiration, and to the most fastidious taste is no disfiguration to the stove. A thorough inspection of the stove will satisfy all that it is UNEQUALLED.

PRICES, $12, $14 and $16.

Please call and examine it at
